

Forsaken

When Vaxon was infected by an insidious mental virus, he hid it from the world believing that he was strong enough to beat it. Years later, the virus has won. Vaxon is Forsaken; a death sentence for a Hunter who has spent a lifetime protecting others from what he has now become. There is no cure. There is no hope. His only choices are to give up – allow himself to be hunted – or give in – surrender to the evil that has taken over his mind.

Forgotten

Okay, so maybe Chalia has given up on life, but really, can you blame a girl? Plagued by demons her whole life, she had tried to use her 'gift' – read 'curse' – for good with disastrous results. Now the Taha'an is asking her to try again. Considering the fact that she's spent the last seven years residing in a nuthouse – voluntarily – hopped up on some serious pharmaceuticals, what are the chances she can actually pull it off? Slim to none, but heck, as the fallen Hunter's only hope, she has to give it a try...right?

He has lost hope. She has given up on hope. Can they somehow save each other?